THE FIVE DAY-RIDE

by LAWRENCE J. BURPEE

Three-score fortunate Trail Riders set out from Louise on a glorious adventure. Several hundred others missed the opportunity of a lifetime, or let us be merciful and say, 'one of the opportunities of a lifetime.'

The three-score had gathered from far and near, but mostly from hot, dusty, stale and gasoline-infested cities of the east and west, to breathe for a few never-to-be-forgotten days the clear and intoxicating air of the mountains.

And unquestionably it is intoxicating. There is a rare quality in this air that makes 'Johnny Walker' or even 'Haig and Haig' taste like ginger ale. I know a man who, from force of habit, carried a flask through the Five Days' Ride, and used the contents on the last day to rub a bruised ankle. Believe it or not.

No one can doubt that this mountain air goes to the heads of some of us. Witness the reckless girl who went for a swim in the swirling, inhospitable waters of the Pipestone, and the unidentified person who sang of her achievement in such dogish measures as these:

There was a young lady of Banff,
Who arrived hot and dusty in camff;
She leaped in the river,
And yelled, with a shiver,
If the Pipestone ain't icy, I'm damff.

But let one of us at least remain sober. I am to tell the story of the Five Days' Ride, and the Editor says I must do it in a thousand words; I've already used about two hundred and fifty, and we haven't yet set off to climb the first hill.

Bill Potts and the Colonel

Well, we are off, and presently, if you are in a strategic position, you shall see the long line zigzagging up the steep trail from the river to the top of the ridge. Sixty of us on sixty cayuse—or should it be cayuses?—and in any case, what is a cayuse? Sixty bipeds on sixty quadrupeds, or one hundred and twenty nondescript mammals. That is as we appear to the jaundiced eyes of the Alpine Club. Nevertheless we're happy mammals, with the exception of an occasional four-footed one who casts longing eyes back down the trail. The pony who went "off on a spree" last year does not seem to be with the bunch.

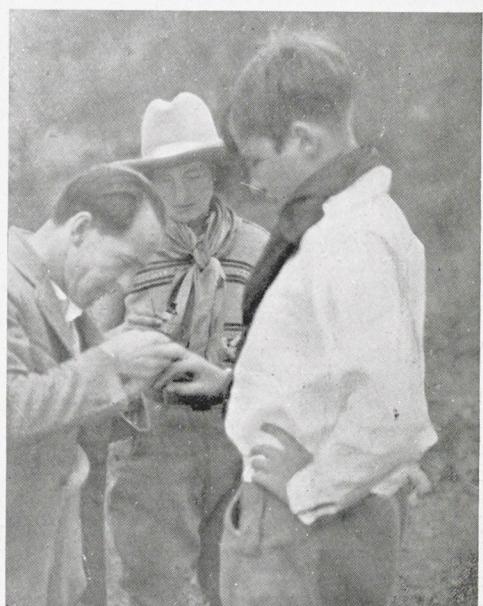

Did I say we were happy? Well, nearly all of us. Bill Potts is wrapped in a cloud of anxious gloom. One can see him running his eyes up and down the line, counting his charges and their chargers. They are all there, but his pessimistic soul will hardly admit it. And Harold Eustace Key's countenance registers the tragic conviction that life is nothing but one darn bump after another. Even the assurance that his one-cylinder organ is safe cannot make him smile. And there are five long days, and four long Sing-Songs where he must sit on a packing box and dissemble his agony.

Running over the party when we made camp that first night, one found some familiar faces, notably those of Byron Harmon, Carl and Mrs. Rungius, Walter Nixon, Madeline Turnor, Phil Moore, Chief Long Lance and Kilroy Harris; and many that were unfamiliar but that hid personalities one learned to esteem before the end of the ride. Some that one had hoped to meet were not here. Murray Gibbon, with his cigarettish smile, was with the Three Days' Ride; Madge MacBeth was somewhere in the carefully manicured wilds of Nova Scotia; the always companionable Nivens were on other trails.

Looking back now, from the end of the long trail, one is impressed with the fact that it was an extraordinarily successful ride. The weather was ideal. I suppose we all had an uncomfortable feeling that, for the sake of the fire-ridden country, we should be praying for rain. If we did, there must have been a mental reservation—at the end of five days. The Clerk of the Weather did try to scare us the second night, but after a rumble of thunder and a sprinkle of rain he thought better of it, and perhaps put his extinguisher to more effective use over in the Columbia valley.

There were no accidents, although it was rumored at one time that two members of the party had fallen down a crevasse in the Bow glacier. The camps were ideal, and, although some of us had taken too literally the advice that a couple of blankets were sufficient, and others had not yet acquired the art of making noses to where they belonged. Odd, isn't it, that the same bit of color should look charming on a girl's cheeks but not on her nose? One to do?" he cried. "Do", said Walter; "Why, cry yourself to sleep, of course". Then he relented, and showed him how to make a camp bed.

Each day's ride was a memorable experience. The trail ran along high ridges with views of lakes that were sometimes emerald and sometimes turquoise, glaciers that gleamed beyond the shoulders of sombre hillsides, giant peaks that appeared unexpectedly, soaring up and up into the blue in a majestic splendor that brought a lump into one's throat, and gave a new meaning to those fine lines of the old psalm: "I, to the hills will lift mine eyes."

The trail swung down to ford a creek and up the other side of the gully. It ran through brûlé and through second growth, and sometimes through the cool cathedral aisles of the primaeval forest. It gave up glimpses of Hector Lake, and carried us along the very shores of that exquisite beautiful tarn, Bow Lake. It spread out before us a panorama that took in the Waputik Range, Bow Peak, the mountains about the headwaters of the Bow, Dolomite, Molar and a score more of great peaks, and embraced within its own circumference Hector, Richardson, Pika, Ptarmigan and Redoubt.

There comes back to one vivid memories of the long climb up from Mosquito Creek to the summit, of the picturesque line of riders winding their way snake-wise up the steep trail, of the camera and motion-picture men scampering madly ahead to strategic points, and of Byron Harmon and his horse posing unconsciously on an outcropping rock at the very summit. But a truce to memories of the Five Days' Ride of 1926. Here's to the Six Days' Ride of 1927, and to the camp fire at the foot of Assiniboine!

THE THREE-DAY RIDE

BY E. L. CHICANOT

After having completed the three days' ride with the Trail Riders of the Canadian Rockies there is only one regret—that one had perforce to take the ride of shorter duration and so missed two additional days of unique travel, varied pleasure, and satisfying companionship. The majority of the riders on the shorter ride were neophytes, now new members with the button significant of the first fifty miles of mountain trail covered, but if final expressions are to be credited they will nearly all be back next year to more speedily swell their figures of mileage by participation in the longer rides. One could not more succinctly sum up the success of the three days' ride.

On the morning of July 31st, riders left Banff and Lake Louise by motor at 7.30 and met at Johnstone's Canyon about an hour later. They had scarcely had time to relieve the stiffening of their limbs when the sound of hoofbeats heralded the approach of their mounts, and round the bend, led and driven by cowboys, came the vari-colored, vari-sized drove, each bearing stock or pack saddle. A distribution was very rapidly made, stirrups were adjusted, and in a surprisingly short time the cavalcade set out, nearly fifty riders strong, under the leadership of J. M. Wardle and the actual guidance of that veteran, Jim Brewster.

Slowly the long line of riders trickled up the canyon side and the entire morning was occupied with the gradual ascent of this incline, the way leading for the most part through heavy timber and dense undergrowth. Shortly before noon the riders reached the level of the open valley of the Johnstone Creek just above the falls. After traversing this for about three miles and passing the Pot Holes, a ranger's cabin was sighted, which was the first halting place. The cook was in attendance, with his pack horse carrying food and dishes, and in record time lunch was prepared.

With but brief delay the riders were into the saddle again and out upon the narrow trail, plunging into the deeper mountain recesses with all the zest and exhilaration of explorers. During the afternoon the way continued up Johnstone's Creek, with an ever-changing panorama of landscape. In and out the trail wound, through dense spruce and pine woods, across creeks of crystal clearness, and into regulated parklands, the riders being ever in the shadow of some massive crag, until towards evening the white dots of the first night's camp were seen near the mouth of Hiltz Creek, directly beneath towering Mount Pulsatilla.

The night in camp proved equally as enjoyable as the day upon the trail. It presented, in fact, the first opportunity of any real intimacy with fellow-riders and the forging of those first links of fellowship which were to be found so binding at the conclusion of the ride. As supper concluded and dusk began to creep on, the white-covered pack train became visible entering the far end of the valley and all eyes were fixed upon the narrow ribbon winding sinuously through the gloom until the animals, hitched head to tail, reached camp. Then as they were unloaded a wild scramble ensued for duffle bags, followed by a rush in the direction of teepees to preempt quarters.

Then the evening really commenced as the huge bonfire of spruce and larch was lighted and riders, guides, and packers gathered in a circle about it. Under the leadership of Mr. W. H.

Hewetson and the stirring accompaniment of his ukelele the sing-song got under way to gradually gather volume as the uninitiated became familiar with the repertoire of the Trail Riders. The bonds of brotherhood drew tighter as the flames lowered and the embers died, and whereas individuals had set out in the morning it was members of a family who broke away in groups and wandered off to teepees.

An al fresco night in the mountains was a new and entertaining experience for many. Balsam boughs look a good deal more romantic than they feel after an hour or two's reclining. Any number of blankets becomes painfully inadequate. But, unforgettable is the waking in the night to feel the deep, awe-inspiring silence which in no wise seems to be broken by the tinkle of the bells on the hobbled ponies or the dull roar of water in the creek.

The memory of the morning, all the mornings, too is indelible. The reluctant struggling from blankets to emerge from the teepee into the heady air and find a big red sun which has just topped the mountain; the hesitancy over the eternal outing question "To shave or not to shave"; the wandering down to the creek to shiver over cursory ablutions; and the electrification of energy upon the welcome "Ya-hoo! Come and get it" from the cook's tent. Then into the saddle again and out upon the eternal trail.

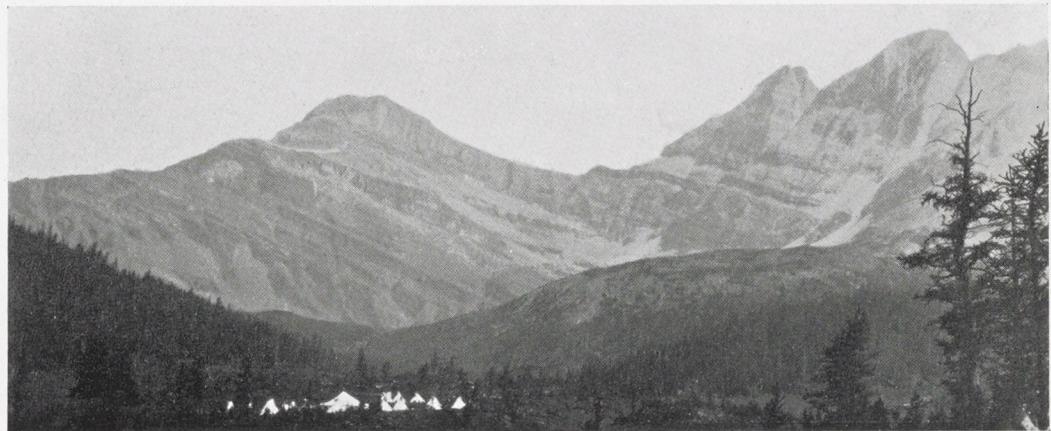

The procession filed through the bottle-neck exit from the valley and proceeded over an open pass along the slope of a rugged alpine meadow, with Mount Pulsatilla still looming over the left flank. From here the trail dropped steeply down on the far side of the divide, to lead past a long silvery lake to the head waters of Baker Creek. Skirting the shores of Baker and Ptarmigan Lakes and crossing the rugged pass to Corral Creek, the squadron entered the end of the Ptarmigan Valley, to glimpse beneath them the tents and corrals of the five-day riders, who had reached their destination just ahead of them.

It had been a glorious day, filled to the brim with the zest of living. The ever-changing trail held fresh surprises of wild beauty round every bend, and each hour had a new and wonderful picture to reveal. The cavalcade disturbed mountain sheep, which scampered nimbly away over rocks to reappear periodically as, full of curiosity, the shy animals followed in its flank. White dots above the timber line on the mountains with the aid of field glasses became mountain goat. Once a huge golden eagle hovered long over the line of riders. It was an entirely different, a little known world.

There was at first a certain regret in making that last camp in the lovely setting of the mountain-rimmed Ptarmigan Valley, for there the identity of the little family was largely lost in its merger with the larger one. But this did not prevail. The assimilation of members into the larger group was rapid and they experienced the same feeling of kin to the gathering at the afternoon's rodeo, the evening's pow-wow in the Sundance Lodge, and in the other events and ceremonies which brought the Trail Ride of 1926 to a close. More reluctantly than ever, riders broke away from the happy circle about the roaring fire and made their way to teepees in an atmosphere that put horse blankets at a premium.

The promise was fulfilled and they emerged next morning to find the valley carpeted with glistening frost and films of ice upon the water pails. But the sun was shining brightly as they obeyed the last summons of the cook and poured from all directions to line up at the breakfast table. Busy hours ensued for packers as camp was struck and the last white covered train made up. The sun was high in the heavens before riders were again into saddles and set out upon the last section of mountain trail leading back to Lake Louise and the world of everyday things.

There the family was swallowed up as riders dispersed in a dozen different directions. Three days. It had been all too brief. But it had been time enough to learn something of the beauty, the wonder, and magic the Rockies region hides from railway and motor road, and for the lure to take hold which will tug relentlessly in other years, as well as to have acquired a new and keener appreciation of the term of fellowship—that spirit of universal brotherhood born of the freshness of the mountains and the bigness and cleanliness of its life.

To one to whom mountain trail riding is a new diversion it is clear that a novel and highly satisfying manner of vacationing has been methodically established and is being steadily popularized. Few outdoor lovers of their own initiative could embark upon an expedition into the mountain recesses involving such elaborate preparation. The excellent arrangements of the Trail Riders of the Canadian Rockies absolutely precludes the worry and planning ordinarily incidental to such a wilderness outing while minimizing expenditure through a sharing of guides, packers, etc., and multiplying the pleasure received through the greater participation of congenial fellows. Furthermore, it was clearly evidenced in the excellence of arrangements that the veriest tenderfoot need entertain not the slightest apprehension as to his ability to withstand the temporary divorce from civilization or to the possibility of his extracting the completest enjoyment from the brief separation. The trail ride is for everyone, the only sine qua non being a love of the Canadian Rockies region and all that pertains to its engrossing life.

"Ding Dong," the Trail Riders Song, written by Harold Eustace Key, and adopted as an official Song at the General Meeting held in the Ptarmigan Valley may be obtained (price 40 cents) from the Secretary-Treasurer or from the publishers, Le Carillon, 3 St. Catherine St. E., Montreal.
